The subject of panic has always been the big one for me. When I was growing up in the UK, a lightening strike was something that happened at the same time and place every year. Of course that wasn't always the case. I remember a strike a year and a half after I was born and a strike nearly 40 years later. It was never a happy experience to wake up on the day of the strike and prepare yourself for "you don't know if it's going to be here today, or there next day" During the 2015 summer period when it was a wet rainy but never sunny period I had my first and only strike here in Australia. It was over night and no-one had any idea the storm was coming. By the time the sun came up it was gone. We were lucky it only struck up the coast at all. Most places are at least a couple of hundred kilometres north. I haven't been having too much of a problem since then. I'm taking the summer months to just sit it out but now I have a house I am looking at ways of protecting. You can read more about my plans here. Just a quick note about the Lightening strike rocks. If you are in one of the most intense parts of an electrical storm, say on the edge of a thunderstorm the ground will get a severe flash strike almost instantly. These are the ones that are almost certain to cause issues. If you are next to these rocks and get a flash then you can and will get a lot of electrical surges. If you are lucky and live outside of these areas, the damage you may get is not very serious. If you are unlucky, then the damage can be extremely bad, even fatal. This is why, during the summer when we are in a storm, I always keep them somewhere they don't endanger anyone.

Most of us who live in Australia are blessed with dry conditions. That's why there
