Movies are also often shorter than television programmes, which can make it easy to focus on a. Miscommunication over the phase-out of nuclear energy is hindering a shift to clean and renewable energies in Europe, according to a study published Tuesday in the journal Nature Climate Change. "Everybody is more or less willing to recognize the influence of nuclear energy on climate change, but there is still a lot of misinformation out there," said the study's lead author, Michael Oppenheimer, director of the Princeton Environmental Institute. The study shows that for every additional gigawatt of nuclear energy, the world emits 40 million tons of carbon dioxide (CO2) more per year. Nuclear energy is also roughly four times as expensive as fossil fuels, which could be a reason why it has become even less attractive since the environmental movement's success in preventing the construction of new plants in the U.S. The study was based on seven data-rich countries, mostly in Europe, with roughly 300 gigawatts (GW) of electricity generated by nuclear power. Oppenheimer said that once people realize how much nuclear power has to do with climate change, there could be a shift in opinion, just like with the debate over fossil fuels. "There's a fossil fuel lobby, but there's no equivalent to the nuclear industry lobby," Oppenheimer said. The past 15 years has seen a long string of court battles and public protests to stop the construction of new nuclear plants in the U.S., raising hopes that Europe might be slowly shifting to renewables, but new data suggest that isn't the case. Across Europe, there has been a 15 percent increase in the amount of electricity produced by nuclear power over the past decade, and the share of nuclear energy in the European Union's electricity generation has nearly doubled. In France, for instance, nuclear energy has risen from 5 percent to 9 percent since 2010, according to official figures. The share has jumped in Germany, where nuclear energy went from 26 percent in 2010 to 33 percent. But much of the rise in renewables has been fueled by a policy that promotes solar and wind power. A timeline of the "Energiewende" in Germany shows the country producing twice as much electricity from renewables since 2000. In France, the shift in emphasis has been led by Nicolas Hulot, the minister of ecology, tourism, heritage and sport. He's credited with putting the ♠ 3e33713323
